

Young People Debate G8 Issues at Junior 8 Summit in Germany

Berlin/ Geneva/ New York, 5 June 2007 – Young people from Group of 8 (G8) industrialized nations and from the developing world are meeting with German Chancellor Angela Merkel in Berlin today as part of the Junior 8 Summit, an international youth conference with an agenda that mirrors that of the G8 Summit commencing tomorrow in Heiligendamm, Germany.

In addition to their meeting with Chancellor Merkel today, J8 representatives will also hold a press conference with UNICEF Goodwill ambassador Sir Roger Moore in Berlin.

The Junior 8 Summit is a joint initiative sponsored and spearheaded by UNICEF and the Morgan Stanley International Foundation (MSIF). It aims to strengthen the voice of children and young people and enhance their ability to influence decisions at the G8. In addition to direct interaction with world leaders at the G8, the J8 program empowers young people to discuss key global issues and to advocate for urgent solutions and actions by G8 leaders, by fostering a global youth movement around issues on the international agenda.

In preparation for their meeting with G8 leaders, 64 young people from G8 countries and ten children from developing countries gathered last Sunday in Wismar, Germany, for a week-long forum to debate four key issues: Prospects for economic development in Africa, HIV/AIDS, climate change and energy efficiency, and new global challenges – among them intellectual property rights and corporate social responsibility. On 7 June, eight of the young people will have the chance to voice their concerns directly to G8 leaders when they meet them face-to-face in a live televised conference.

The German Chancellor Angela Merkel, who invited Junior 8 participants to her office in Berlin prior to her departure for Heiligendamm, applauded their participation and input.

"The G8 has set out an ambitious agenda for the upcoming summit in Heiligendamm," Chancellor Merkel said. "We want to address questions around world economics, achieve better climate protection, and further deepen our partnership with Africa. I am looking forward to discuss these issues particularly with young people and to learn about their ideas and wishes for the future. These discussions are an important part of our preparations for the summit."

Speaking from New York, UNICEF Executive Director Ann M. Veneman said, "Issues being discussed at the G8 directly impact on the lives of children and young people. UNICEF applauds the G8 for taking the time to listen to the voices of youth. And we congratulate the J8 participants for giving serious thought to the kind of world they wish to inherit."

Morgan Stanley Chairman and Chief Executive Officer John J. Mack commented: "The Junior 8 teams are an outstanding example of the commitment of today's young people to dealing with the most significant social, environmental and economic issues. Morgan Stanley is proud to be a co-founder and sponsor of the J8, which gives today's youth a much-needed voice on the global policy stage. It is critical that these students' progressive views be shared with the world they are inheriting", he concluded.

Too often the issues central to the G8 are not considered children's issues. However, a closer look at startling statistics on HIV/AIDS, poverty and global climate change shows that these topics are all too real for the world's children.

For example:

- Around 2.3 million children under 15 have been infected with HIV and 15 million children have been orphaned by AIDS. Of those requiring pediatric treatment, only 10 per cent have access to such treatment, and only 11 per cent of HIV-positive pregnant women have access to services to prevent-mother-to-child transmission.
- Every three seconds a child dies as a result of poverty, and 300 million people are still suffering from hunger. Around 5.5 million children die from malnutrition every year.
- According to Save the Children, in the next decade, up to 175 million children are likely to be affected every year by natural disasters brought about by climate change. By 2010, 50 million people will be 'environmentally displaced,' most of whom will be women and children.
